Ellis Island was named after Samuel Ellis, a farmer who owned the island in the early 1800s. The island was originally used as a quarantine station for ships arriving in New York City. In 1892, the U.S. government opened an immigration station on Ellis Island. The station quickly became overcrowded, and in 1900, a new, larger station was built.

The new Ellis Island immigration station was a huge, sprawling complex. It had a main building, a hospital, a dormitory, and a power plant. The main building was a three-story, brick building with a large central hall. The hall was filled with long rows of benches, where immigrants sat while they waited to be processed.

The Ellis Island immigration station was a busy place. In 1907, over 1 million immigrants were processed through the station. The immigrants came from all over the world, but most of them came from Eastern and Southern Europe.

The immigrants who arrived at Ellis Island were processed in a long and detailed process. They were first interviewed by a doctor, who checked for any diseases. They were then interviewed by an immigration inspector, who asked them questions about their background and their reasons for coming to America.

If the immigrants passed the inspection, they were allowed to enter the United States. If they failed the inspection, they were sent back to their home country.

Ellis Island was a place of hope and fear for the millions of immigrants who passed through it. It was the gateway to a new life in America, but it was also a place where dreams could be shattered.

In 1954, the Ellis Island immigration station was closed. The station was reopened in 1990 as a museum. The museum tells the story of the millions of immigrants who came to America through Ellis Island.

Ellis Island is a reminder of the millions of people who have come to America in search of a better life. It is a symbol of hope and opportunity, and it is a reminder of the importance of immigration in American history.
