The mass deportation was carried out with brutal efficiency. Armed vigilantes forced the miners and their families from their homes at gunpoint and herded them into cattle cars. The deportees were then taken to the New Mexico desert and abandoned without food or water.

Among those deported was John C. Embree, a prominent IWW organizer. Embree was charged with sedition and criminal syndicalism, but he refused to plead guilty to the charges. He stood trial in Tucson, Arizona, and was acquitted by a jury of his peers.
