After graduating from law school, Gandhi returned to India and began practicing law. However, he soon became disillusioned with the British legal system and the way it treated Indians. He decided to devote his life to fighting for Indian independence.

Gandhi and the Indian Independence Movement

Gandhi became a leader of the Indian independence movement in the early 1900s. He advocated for nonviolence and civil disobedience as a means of achieving independence from British rule. Gandhi's ideas were controversial at the time, but they eventually gained widespread support.

Gandhi led a number of major protests and campaigns against British rule. In 1930, he led the Salt March, a 240-mile march to the sea to protest the British salt tax. The Salt March was a major turning point in the Indian independence movement, and it helped to galvanize support for Gandhi's cause.

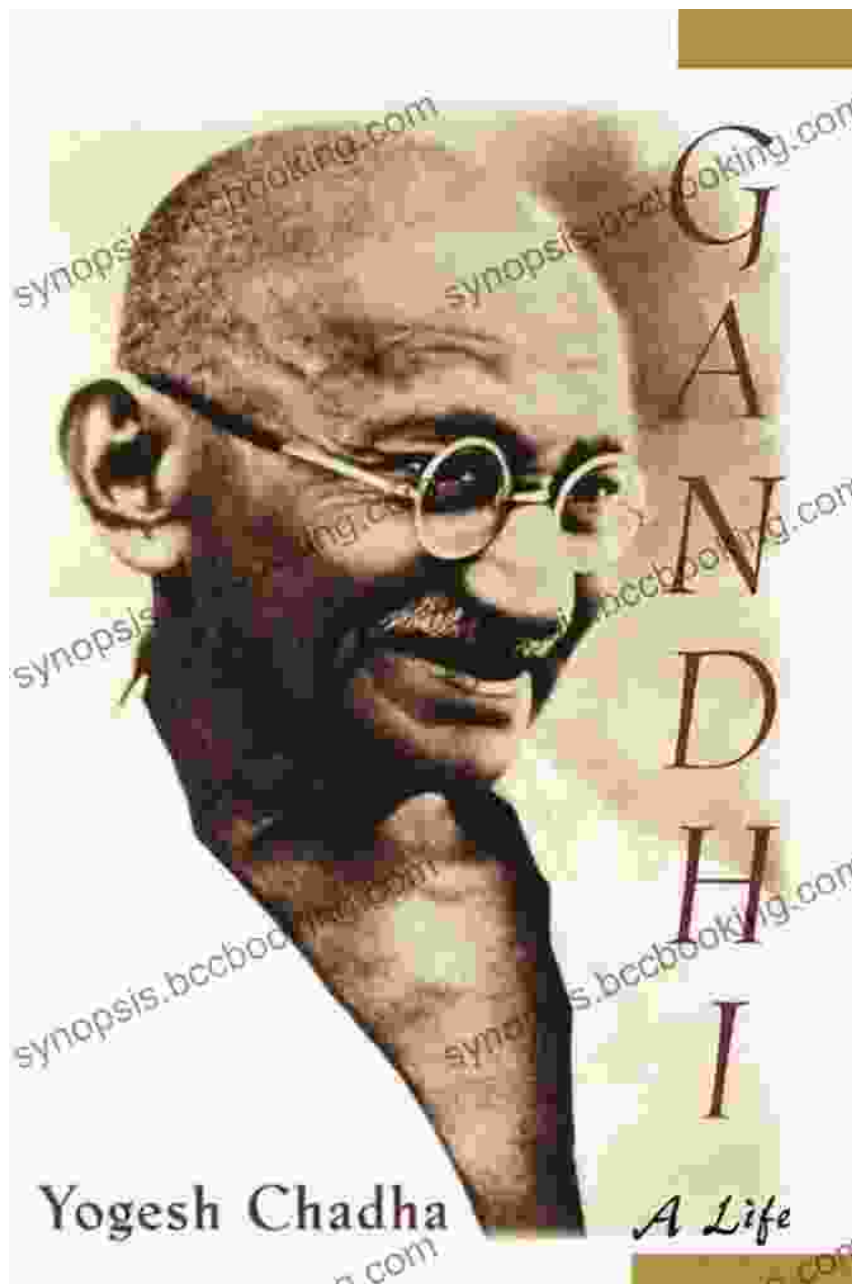

In 1947, India finally gained independence from British rule. Gandhi played a key role in the negotiations that led to independence, and he is considered one of the fathers of the Indian nation.

Gandhi's Assassination

Gandhi was assassinated in 1948 by a Hindu extremist. His assassination was a major tragedy, and it shocked the world. Gandhi is still revered as a symbol of peace and nonviolence, and his legacy continues to inspire people around the world.
