

Pura Vida: Two Months in Central America

In 2017, I quit my job and sold all my belongings to travel Central America for two months. I had always dreamed of exploring this vibrant region, and I was eager to experience its rich culture, stunning landscapes, and friendly people.

My journey began in Guatemala, where I spent a week exploring the ancient Mayan ruins of Tikal and the colonial city of Antigua. From there, I traveled to Belize, where I swam with sharks and rays in the Belize Barrier Reef. I then continued on to Honduras, where I hiked through the lush rainforests of Pico Bonito National Park. In Nicaragua, I visited the historic city of Granada and surfed the waves at Playa Maderas. And finally, I ended my trip in Costa Rica, where I relaxed on the beaches of Manuel Antonio National Park and hiked to the top of Cerro Chirripó, the highest peak in Central America.

Along the way, I met many interesting people, from fellow travelers to local villagers. I learned about the history and culture of each country, and I gained a new appreciation for the beauty and diversity of Central America.
