The Planning Stages

The planning for the Coronation began almost immediately after Queen Elizabeth's accession to the throne in 1952. A Coronation Committee was appointed to oversee the event, and they worked tirelessly to ensure that every detail was perfect.

One of the most important decisions that the Coronation Committee had to make was the choice of the coronation gown. The gown was designed by Norman Hartnell, and it was made of white satin and encrusted with thousands of pearls and diamonds. The gown was so heavy that Queen Elizabeth had to be helped into it by her ladies-in-waiting.

Another important decision was the choice of the coronation crown. The Imperial State Crown is the most famous and valuable crown in the British Crown Jewels. It is made of gold and set with 2,868 diamonds, 17 sapphires, 11 emeralds, and 269 pearls. The crown weighs over four pounds, and it is said to be worth millions of dollars.

The planning for the Coronation was a complex and challenging process, but the Coronation Committee was determined to create an event that would be both memorable and meaningful.
